Wine of the Week

The term 'garagisti' originated in Bordeaux, where the garagistes made wines that contrasted stylistically with those of the great Chateaux. It has now come to refer to winemakers who work outside of the mainstream, often producing great wines despite the absence of large winemaking facilities or outside investment – and, yes, sometimes vinifying in a garage. I Garagisti di Sorgono is an example of the latter: three friends living and working in central Sardegna, in an historic winemaking region called Mandrolisai, where untrained vines can sometimes approach a century in age. Their wines are as cheeky and playful as they are deep and precise, and 'Murru,' made with the island's indigenous Monica grape, is no exception (and our favorite of the bunch). Deep, blue and black fruits are married with an herbal, garrigue-driven earthiness and a wild character that is distinctly Sardinian: imagine a broad-shouldered cru Beaujolais gone Thelma & Louise. Inky but fresh, full but juicy, savory but easy to pair with a wide range of dishes, this wine is a toothsome introduction to a grape that deserves a great deal more attention.

Distillati di Capovilla

— Veneto

Vittorio Gianni Capovilla was an unlikely candidate to ascend to the mantle of the greatest distiller in Italy — and, arguably, the world. He spent the majority of his career as a Formula 3 racecar mechanic in Switzerland, but his travel throughout Austria and Germany left him fascinated with the small home distilleries he found on the properties of nearly every farmer and winemaker. Italy is not well-known for distillation because of the stringent regulations surrounding them; while Austria houses over 90,000 distilleries, in Italy there are only about 120. Willing to take on the challenge, he commissioned an Austrian artisan to build him a double bain-marie alembic still, which requires a time-consuming and painstaking distillation process, in 1986, and began producing both grappa and fruit distillates, sourcing the base fruit from his own farm, along with other organic farms in the region, and some of Italy's top winemakers - Gravner, Dal Forno, and Soldera among them. While Italian regulations allow the use of up to 20% added sugar and 3% aromatic enhancements, Vittorio chooses to forgo both, producing a spirit that is the purest expression of the fruit used as its base. These distillates are produced in achingly small quantities - sometimes fewer than 275 bottles, each only 375mL — and are simply profound expressions of Italian terroir. These soulful pours are unparalleled, and the painstaking process involved in sourcing and distilling the fruit makes these artful libations more than worth the price. (Speaking of which, prices below are for two-ounce pours. We're deeply excited to have you taste these, so please let us know if you'd prefer a one-ounce sample instead, at half the price shown.)

Grappe di Nonino

— Friuli

In many ways, Nonino's story is a study in contrasts with that of Capovilla: they have been making Grappa since 1897, and now operate five separate distilleries, each with 12 steam copper stills. But their size and success correlate to their essential role in the modernization of grappa. Previously considered a peasant's beverage, distilled from the leftover grape pomace (seeds, skins, and a bit of liquid) after the winemaking process, Grappa rose to prominence when Nonino felt it was necessary to produce it as a premium, artisanal after-dinner beverage. They bottled the first single-varietal grappa in 1973 using the Picolit grape, and are now well-known for their single-varietal grappa distillates. (Fun fact: the Nonino family also funds an annual literary award called the International Nonino Prize; previously intended to reward those who helped preserve Friulian traditions, it is now a prestigious award for writers all around the globe.) These grappa are pure distillates of varietals that are important to the Friulian and international wine heritage, and are widely considered among the most quintessential grappa on the market today.
