About our name:

The Croton Reservoir (officially the Croton Distributing Reservoir), once NYC's foremost water source. It stood where the New York Public Library, with its lions, is now.

The year 1842 marked what was perhaps the greatest forward stride in the city's history – the general introduction of running water...when the reservoir was first completed it had a spacious promenade all around the top of the walls upon which gay and animated groups constantly gathered. Old letters speak of the delightful scene at night, with the moonlight dancing on the water. In the daytime, the charming views of Long Island, the distant hills of Westchester, and the lordly heights of the Palisades provided a fascinating panorama. It was certainly a delightful spot...

New York's first water system was built between 1837 and 1842. Prior to those years, water was obtained from cisterns, wells and barrels from rain.

Construction began in 1837 on a series of mostly underground conduits that would bring water from the Croton River in northern Westchester County to NYC's spigots. Amazingly, it took only five years to finish the first connection given the technology available at the time.

Two reservoirs were built in New York City, one between the present-day lines of 6th and 7th Avenues and 79th and 85th Streets, and a smaller distributing reservoir on 5th and 42nd. The former was drained in 1930 and its site is now occupied by Central Park's Great Lawn. The latter was torn down to make room for the main branch of the New York Public Library, which rose in 1911. Those reservoirs were replaced by two huge tunnels that were built in 1917 and 1937; a third is still under construction. Central Park's present Reservoir was begun in 1858 and was a part of NYC's water distribution system all the way till 1991.

The Croton Distributing Reservoir

In 1847, following the construction of one of the city's most imposing edifices, the Croton Distributing Reservoir, on the present site of the New York Public Library, the city designated the former potter's field to its west as a public park called Reservoir Square, a simple Victorian greensward. The reservoir itself, built in 1839-43, was a man-made lake four acres in area, surrounded by massive, fifty-foot-high, twenty-five-foot-thick granite walls designed in a vaguely Egyptian style. Along the tops of the walls were public promenades, offering breathtaking views.
