Dessert Cocktails Are A Sweet But Boozy Way To End A Great Night

An infamously doomed queen is said to have uttered the legendary phrase: "Let them eat cake!" (The phrase was actually "Qu'ils mangent de la brioche," but that is a fair translation.) Her words have never actually been proven to have been said (such is the stuff of legends after all), but as she lost her head not long after, they were not well received.

The reality is, not everyone is into dessert. (Shocking, but true!) For those out there who rather drink their dessert than enjoy cake or ice cream at the end of a night out, these cocktails are the perfect answer.

Alco-hall & Oates

At Machine: engineered dining + drink in Chicago, this drink is made with Cocoa Puff infused oat milk, bourbon, chocolate liqueur, garnished with Cocoa Puffs. "I fondly refer to Alco-Hall & Oates as grown up chocolate milk. The feelings of nostalgia when drinking out of the carton combined with the familiar flavor of Cocoa Puffs, creates a great drink for any time of day, but is especially satisfying after dinner when you have a bit of a sweet tooth," said bartender Aneka Saxon.
