

“gertie”

During the prohibition era (1920-1933), the import, sale, and consumption of alcohol was forbidden by law. Organized crime and bootlegging rose to meet the public's demand for booze. One legendary rum-runner was Gertrude “Cleo” Lythgoe.

Working in New York as a stenographer for a British importer/exporter when prohibition was passed, Gertie was chosen to set up a wholesale liquor business operating out of Nassau. Gertie operated fearlessly in a male-dominated profession. On one occasion, when she heard herself and her goods being bad-mouthed by a man, she marched into the barber's shop, dragged the critic out and took him to her office. There, she promised to “put a bullet through him” if he didn't stop. The man fled. Other men tried to intimidate her and found themselves threatened at gunpoint by the beautiful Gertie.

During her years of operation, Gertie achieved celebrity status through popular newspaper stories. Eventually she left the Bahamas, retired from the bootlegging business, and returned to America. She died in 1974, at the age of 86.

404 OLD FASHIONED

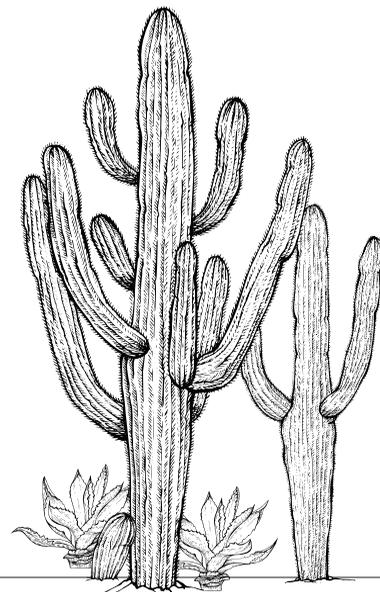

homemade brown butter
knob creek bonded
pecan syrup

~ 14

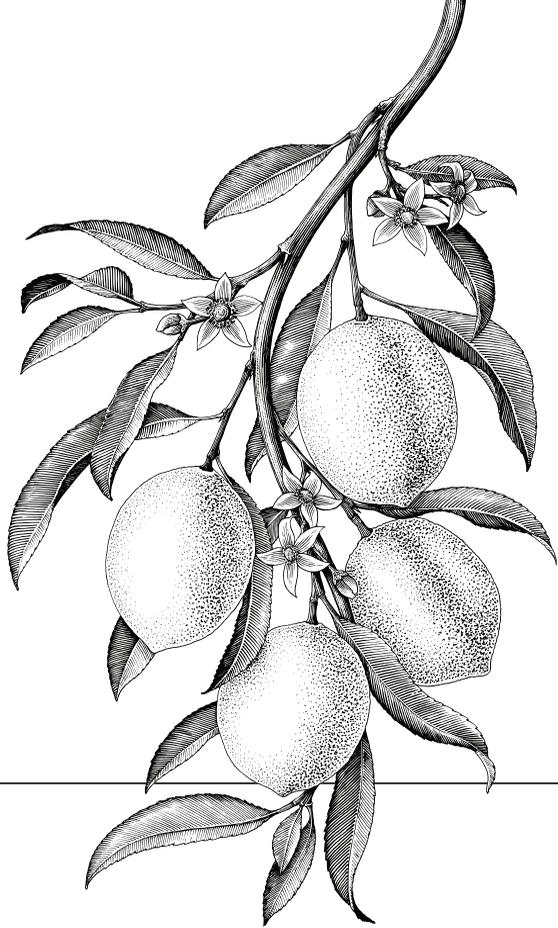

The smoothest Old Fashioned we've ever tasted. Enough said.

404 MARGARITA

exotico blanco ancho reyes
fresh lime
~ 14

Lots of tequila was available during Prohibition in Tijuana, a Mexican town right across the border from California known as “Satan’s Playground.” With over 100 bars in Tijuana alone, and tequila’s notorious ability to bring out some crazy behavior, this earthy margarita rendition deserves a style that calls to mind this booming Mexican border town.
