MAKGEOLLI

makgeolli is a korean rice wine that is milky, lightly sparkling, and has a cloudy appearance due to natural grain sediment. makgeolli has a sweet-sour flavor profile and regularly highlights notes of stone fruits, melons, bitter apples, sweet grains, and tree nuts. traditionally made at home by fermenting rice, water, and nuruk, the beverage beautifully exemplifies how many different nuanced flavors can be born from so few initial ingredients. koreans regard makgeolli as a gift of nature.

SOJU/RICE

soju, a distilled liquor that originated in korea, is deeply ingrained in the country's culture. traditionally made from fermented rice, wheat, or barley, soju has a smooth texture similar to vodka but with a slightly sweeter flavor profile.

its history dates back to the goryeo dynasty (918-1392) when the mongols introduced distillation techniques from the middle east to korea. the resulting beverage was separated into a clear part, called cheongju, and a cloudy part, called takju. cheongju was reserved for royalty and was distilled into a higher proof spirit; while takju was relegated to the working class as a meal substitute due to its dense nutrients. during the joseon dynasty (1392-1897), distillation techniques were modernized, and the refined soju became an integral part of korean culture, regardless of class. today, korean drinking culture is all about showing respect and taking care of each other. it's often consumed straight in small glasses during social gatherings and celebrations, with the youngest at the table pouring servings for their elders.
