Warm, dimly-lit and super old-school, this looks like a place the guys would have taken their clients for a drink in Mad Men. It's often crowded, especially for the "after work" drinks crowd, but worth a visit for a taste of old New York. The space used to be a financier's office back in the 20's and retains that dignified feel. Being in Grand Central and not becoming a tourist trap isn't easy, but they've managed it. A recent renovation has also led to a relaxing of the formerly-strict dress code, but don't relax too much, this is New York after all and the Campbell is seriously elegant
