Ginology

Deriving its predominant flavor from juniper berries, gin has long been a favorite with English drinkers.

In the latter half of the 18th century, thousands of gin shops opened in England during what became known as the “Gin Craze” era. Termed “Mother’s Ruin,” gin was blamed for high death rates, crime and social degradation. These social ills were epitomized in William Hogarth’s engraving. (shown at left)

Parliament enacted legislation to reduce the consumption of gin. With the Gin Act of 1751, the scourge of “take away” and “drink while standing” small gin shops was eliminated. By 1820, gin producers were distilling a safer drink and as a result, new fashionable gin palaces opened. These establishments had spectacular gas-lit interiors and were called “perfectly dazzling” by Charles Dickens.
